clients for their foray into the dating world. It's less a matchmaking or dating service than a tutoring program in the art of successfully meeting and connecting with people you want to bone—er, date. So by the time I meet up with Jack and Eric, they've rehearsed conversation topics, improved their wardrobes, and learned to tailor their behavior to different settings. (Picking up a woman in a bar is different from picking up a woman in a library.) They've had practice sessions in coffee shops, and now the graduates are ready for a night with me.

At this point my job should be easy, right? But basic training doesn't always make you combat-ready. I've had a superhot client so consumed with social anxiety he really did puke on my shoes. And I've been out with a totally average-looking guy who hit it off with a semifamous musician. I left him in the wee hours surrounded by models.

With Jack and Eric, I had no idea what to need every weapon at Jack is fidgeting, telling a woman that he wants to get married, now, while Eric is striding toward a group announcing, "I want a superhot girl." I'm trying to figure out which one to rein in first, but, hey, at least neither of them has thrown up on me yet.

When I applied to be a wingwoman for New York Dating Coach three years ago, all I knew about the business was I imagined I'd be a white helping the sweet, awkward world. It seemed six hour for three-hour sessions accompany one or two them strike up conversations.
